Culinary experiences are a focal point for many hospitality brands, especially as experiential travel and the interest in local, authentic gastronomy have surged in popularity (see story). Having three dining options, all of which have Michelin stars, will be an attractive lure for discerning guests looking to dine at Paris' best restaurants.

Dining excellence

Three of Four Seasons Hotel George V, Paris – Le Cinq, Le George and L'Orangerie – have a collection of 5 Michelin stars between them. This prestigious honor makes the Four Seasons the first European property to have three Michelin-starred restaurants call it home.

The news came following the announcement of the 2017 Michelin Guide.

Le George and L'Orangerie have both been awarded their first Michelin star in the latest edition of the coveted culinary guide.

Four Seasons Hotel George V, Paris' Le Cinq, a French haute cuisine restaurant, retained the highest accolade of three Michelin stars for the second year in a row.

"We believe that a memorable stay would be incomplete without an extraordinary dining experience," said Jose Silva, regional vice president and general manager of Four Seasons Hotel George V, in a statement.

"As a gastronome myself, I have always had the highest culinary aspirations for our team who have worked to continuously innovate and exceed our guests' expectations," he said. "I believe the five Michelin stars awarded today are a testament to this commitment to excellence brought to life by our chefs, Christian Le Squer, Simone Zanoni, David Bizet and their teams.

"We are honored to be the first hotel in Europe to hold this designation and look forward to many more years of culinary excellence."
