The Manolo Blahnik x Vetements capsule collection of footwear will be exclusive to the online retailer. The collection itself has received a lot of attention due to Manolo Blahnik's enthusiastic following and the near-constant buzz surrounding Vetements, a mainly anonymous design collective fronted by Demna Gvasalia, who also doubles as Balenciaga's creative director.

In an email campaign, Net-A-Porter broke the news that the "shoes you have been waiting for" have finally arrived exclusively online.

The email also includes three images showing styles available in the capsule, such as an electric-blue satin pump, over-the-knee boots and an ankle bootie with a stiletto heel.

Net-A-Porter carries seven footwear styles designed by Vetements and Manolo Blahnik. The capsule includes a mix of heels and boots, ranging in price from $1,585 for slingback pumps to $4,590 for thigh-high boots in bright-orange satin.

All styles have been handmade in Italy.

Net-A-Porter also carries apparel and accessories from Vetements' primary collections.

Manolo Blahnik tapped pop culture sensation Rihanna's unique style sensibility for a design collaboration in March 2016.

Together, the singer and the brand's eponymous designer envisioned six limited-edition styles in denim, mixing the house style with Rihanna's artistry. Rihanna's popularity and global audience have led to a number of fashion and luxury partnerships, including campaigns for Dior and Balmain as well as a gig as creative director of Kering's Puma (see story).
