As publishers work to reevaluate where media belongs in the digital landscape, Condé Nast publications GQ and Vogue will begin streamlining select content to Amazon's Echo Look.

Later this month, the Alexa-powered Echo Look, which includes a camera unlike other Amazon virtual assistant devices, will start to feature magazine content from GQ and Vogue. Found on the home screen of the Echo mobile application, the magazines' content will refresh weekly and be curated by Amazon and Condé Nast.

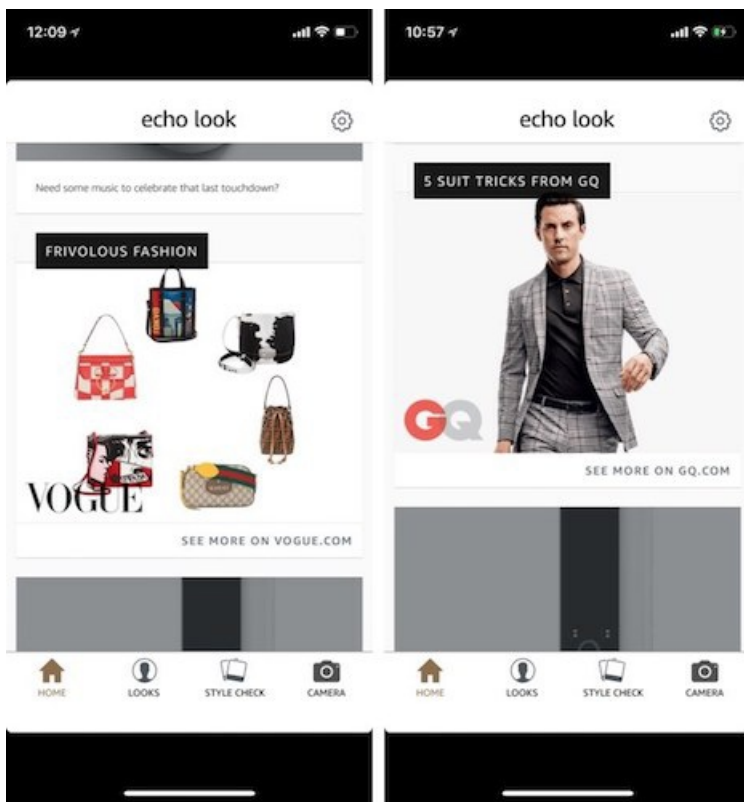

Virtual stylists

The Echo Look x Condé Nast concept works by users taking a selfie with the Amazon device and sending it to the app. When they do, users will be pushed fashion, celebrity or service content from GQ and Vogue.

A percentage of the content seen by Echo Look users will be shoppable. Although Amazon is not in a paid partnership with Condé Nast, the publisher will get a cut of sales if a user clicks to make a purchase based on seen content.

At launch Feb. 19, Vogue will begin running a range of topics on Echo Look, including celebrity news and fashion trends, while GQ plans to focus on style advice and recommendations.

Per Digiday, Condé Nast was motivated by reader requests that asked for help choosing products. Speaking to Digiday, Anna-Lisa Yabsley, digital director at Vogue said, "It's a new distribution method for us. We're really interested in refining and getting a real understanding for where the overlap is between our two audiences."

Other benefits of leveraging Echo Look to interact with users is for the publications to learn what recommendations perform best. Eventually, this knowledge may result in the titles curating content for users.

In a statement to Digiday, Rob DeChiaro, digital general manager at GQ, said, "For us, at first, it's going to be looking around the data on the content that performs well on our platforms, then figuring out what's good in service and utility across Amazon."

Condé Nast can also apply these learnings to ecommerce growth efforts, which it has stated is a 2018 goal.

Amazon currently offers the Echo Look virtual assistant on an exclusive by-invitation basis. The device itself costs $199.99, and potential users must request an invitation from Amazon to purchase.

The hands-free camera includes Amazon's Style Assistant with Alexa, which features Style Check. The Style Check function provides Echo Look users with a second opinion on their outfit.
