Britain's fur industry bites back

As many fashion brands in the U.S. and Europe declare their aversion for fur, British fur manufacturers and trade organizations are fighting back, arguing for freedom of choice and asserting that real fur is far more sustainable and environmentally friendly than the faux alternatives, writes Women's Wear Daily.

The luxury jet industry has a new long-range champion

Bombardier Inc. is extending the range of its marquee business jet to 7,700 nautical miles, unseating the Gulfstream G650 as the long-distance champ of the private-aircraft industry, says Bloomberg.

The world's rarest Rolex Daytona goes under the hammer in Geneva

If ever there was a master of the three-word novel title it was the late Robert Ludlum. He may not have been a writer of Chekhovian depth or Tolstoyan sweep, but when it came to conjuring a sense of urgency and expectation from the definite article in front of two words he was hard to beat: The Scorpio Illusion, The Icarus Agenda, The Rhinemann Exchange and, of course, his trilogy of masterpieces, The Bourne Identity/Supremacy/Ultimatum, according to Financial Times.

Meet fashion's next generation: over 60s

Lyn Slater, a 64-year-old college professor in New York, hates the concept of age. "When I was young, we were burning bras, we were getting high all the time and we dated all the time," she said. "Why do you think we would accept that our life ends when we turn a certain age?" per Business of Fashion.
