The company's CEO Bob Sauerberg took to Twitter to put concerns of her imminent departure aside, affirming that she will remain at Vogue indefinitely. The statement comes after rumors had been circulating for months in fashion and media circles that Ms. Wintour was on the verge of leaving Vogue.

"Anna Wintour is an incredibly talented and creative leader whose influence is beyond measure," Mr. Sauerberg said in a tweet. "She is integral to the future of our company's transformation and has agreed to work with me indefinitely in her role as @voguemagazine editor-in-chief and artistic director of Cond Nast."

Wintour's status

Over the past year or so, reports in a number of fashion news sites have quoted sources that said Ms. Wintour was planning on leaving Vogue sometime in the near future (see story).

For now at least, it looks like those rumors are being put on ice as Mr. Sauerberg says that Ms. Wintour is planning to remain at Vogue "indefinitely."

Ms. Wintour has been at Vogue for 30 years and has come to be seen as the embodiment of the magazine. Her iconic looks and monumental presence in the fashion world have made her a household name and a symbol for fashion at large.

Her most recent efforts as the head of Vogue have not lightened the rumors of her departure. For September's issue, Ms. Wintour handed complete control of the magazine over to Beyonce.

Vogue is looking to embrace diversity within its own business, as it hires its first black cover photographer in its 126-year life span.

Photographer Tyler Mitchell will reportedly be shooting the cover for the magazine, selected by Beyonc. While diversity is becoming more popular in consumer-facing campaign content, it is less diverse within the magazine business. (see story).
