In Max Mara's archive, decades of Italian fashion history

Last August, when Gabriele Monti was co-curating the "Italiana: Italy Through the Lens of Fashion 1971-2001" exhibition in Milan, his first port of call was a 19th-century former hosiery factory. The building in Reggio Emilia, a small city about two hours' drive southeast of Milan, is rarely visited by outsiders and almost never discussed, even by fashion specialists, but may be the single greatest private fashion archive in Italy, according to The New York Times.
