Hermès has reported strong third quarter sales momentum, with its leather goods division performing well, and the maker of deluxe Birkin handbags also played down fears of a slowdown in China. Luxury goods companies have become the subject of investor fears over a potential spending slowdown among Chinese customers (who account for a third of industry sales) as a trade war with the United States simmers on, says Business of Fashion.

Dolce & Gabbana has designed a mini-me collection and our hearts cannot take it

There's something simply adorable about a miniature item of clothing, isn't there? Even the coldest of hearts melts a little when a dress, pair of shoes or jacket is made super-small and for little people. So imagine the unanimous cooing at Grazia HQ when we were one of the first to see Net-A-Porter and Dolce & Gabbana's kidswear collaboration. Together, they are bringing us the cutest party-ready outfits for babies, toddlers and children up to age 12, per Grazia.

Tesla short David Einhorn says last quarter was "as good as it gets"

Prominent Tesla Inc. short seller David Einhorn thinks the third quarter was the high-water mark for the electric-car maker, because sales of pricier Model 3 sedans will wane going forward, reports Bloomberg.

Omega upgrades manufacturer's warranty on all watches to 5 years

Omega has joined the five-year club. The brand now offers a five-year warranty on all its watches, three years beyond the industry's standard warranty of two years, which is dictated by European law. It is among several manufacturers who in recent years have been extending their warranties to three, four and five years, mainly due to the vast technical improvements made in watch manufacturing over the past decade. Some manufacturers offer the extended warranty only on certain models, but Omega is offering it on all models, according to Forbes.
