The jeweler plans to reopen its location in Place Vendôme in Paris, featuring its new winter garden. One of the more attention-grabbing aspects of the 20,000-square-foot space is a special apartment designated for VIP clients, which allows for overnight stays.

Restoration and reopening

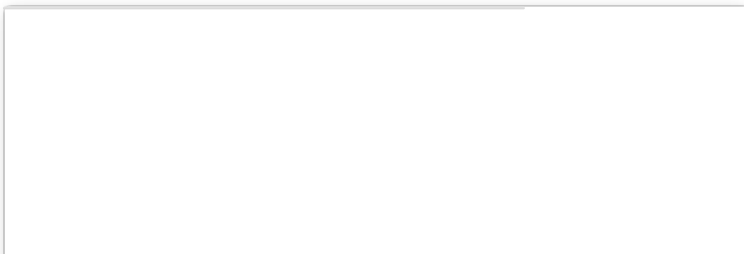

Boucheron let nature take its course as it started renovations of its historic mansion at 26 Place Vendôme in Paris one year ago.

Ahead of its 160th anniversary in 2018, Boucheron's parent Kering Group, with the assistance of Michel Goutal, chief architect for historical monuments, started renovations at the jeweler's flagship in November 2017. The illustrious address has been Boucheron's home since 1893 when founder Frédéric Boucheron became the first jeweler to open in Place Vendôme (see story).

The jeweler will now open its newly renovated doors to the public, as well as its apartment to elite shoppers.

"It's the heritage of Paris, it's the heritage of the Place Vendôme, it has been the heritage of Boucheron, dating back to 1893," said Hélène Poulit-Duquesne, CEO of Boucheron, in a statement to Women's Wear Daily.

"That was the year house founder Frédéric Boucheron set up shop here, at number 26 Place Vendôme," she said. "Cartier, Chaumet and Van Cleef & Arpels followed suit, joined by others over the years, and soon the square became synonymous with the sector, gaining a reputation as the epicenter of French luxury."

Many of the renovations included restoring previously hidden or replaced aspects of the historic building, including a central staircase that was previously concealed over time.

While many of the features of the renovations include restoration, the flagship's Winter Garden is completely new and includes a four-story glass wall that overlooks the vegetation.
