“In Search of the Orient Express” will air March 16 on Arte. The legendary train is synonymous with luxury, leading brands to align themselves through partnerships and marketing efforts.

Travel log

The televised documentary by Louis Pascal Couvelaire was coproduced by BBC France, Together Media and Bleu Kobalt Productions.

During the 19th century, Belgian businessman Georges Nagelmackers, the founder of the International Company of Sleeping Cars, took a bet with the Orient Express, creating a train line that connected Western Europe with Turkey. In 1883, the Orient Express made its first journey from Paris Strasbourg to Constantinople.

Throughout its years, the Orient Express carried famous faces including Josephine Baker, Mata Hari and Agatha Christie. It was also immortalized in Ms. Christie’s “Murder on the Orient Express” novel.

The train line also carried individuals across the Iron Curtain during the Cold War years, passing through Munich, Vienna and the Balkans.

Regular service on the Orient Express stopped in 1977, a casualty of readily available air travel.

The documentary aims to uncover the train's fate by seeking out abandoned cars. Throughout the film, the director tells the story through both historian and expert interviews and reenactments and fictional scenes.

Moynat's history is tied to travel, having been founded at the time when the French railways were being built. In the brand's early years, it fashioned travel trunks for the traveling affluent.

The brand has previously partnered with the Orient Express train line, now operated by Belmond, for a beauty collaboration. A limited-edition case was made to conceal a bottle of Guerlain fragrance.

Moynat's parent company LVMH is in the process of acquiring Belmond (see story).

Belmond, S.T. Dupont and Bibhu are a few of the brands who made an appearance in the 2017 film "Murder on the Orient Express."

20th Century Fox's feature, released worldwide, made its debut riddled with subtle product placements that leaned on luxury and sophistication as well as inspiring product creation. While luxury travel brand Belmond acts as a backdrop for the film, Godiva, S.T. Dupont, Globe Trotter, HSN and Bibhu created products and wardrobe (see story).
