Focusing on connecting to the local community, Four Season Hotel and Private Residences Montreal has opened to the public. The new hotel opens in Montreal's iconic "Social Square" and features the first Canadian restaurant from celebrity chef Marcus Samuelsson.

Coming to Montreal

Four Seasons is touting its impressive event spaces for business meetings and social galas in addition to its spa and wellness facility. The building also features a direct connection to luxury department store Holt Renfrew Ogilvy.

Metallic ribbons are featured against the black building, which was designed by architectures Lemay and Sid Lee Architecture. Gilles & Boissier collaborated with Montreal-based architect and designer Philip Hazan for the interior design.

A variety of artwork will be featured throughout the building, including guest rooms and the Marcus restaurant.

Included in the spa is Kneipp Hydrotherapy, which focuses on healing aspects of hot and cold water, accessed by walking through a reflexology footpath. The therapy pool features a large waterfall, inspired by methods from Bavarian naturopath Sebastian Kneipp in the 19th century.

The spa will feature a variety of cosmetic product lines, including Hungarian skincare brand Omorovicza, British skincare 111Skin and Montreal-based Peoni by JB Skin Guru.

Eighteen private residences are also featured in the Four Seasons, with interiors designed by Montreal-based Philip Hazan.

There are 169 guest rooms and suites, including the Presidential Suite on the top floor featuring a full-sized dining table and butler's pantry.

In another new opening, Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts is appealing to consumers' desire for wellness travel by dedicating a floor of its new Boston property to a fitness center and spa.

Four Seasons Hotel One Dalton Street, Boston is a 61-story tower in the city's Back Bay neighborhood. Marking the second Four Seasons in Boston, the property is positioned for a younger audience (see story).
