Even as the world has gotten more transparent, apparel retailers are lagging behind and the fashion industry continues to be notoriously opaque. After a decade of talk, there is still a lack of meaningful progress in monitoring supply chains and their impact.

Merely promising sustainability will no longer do as consumers become more aware of conscious fashion choices they make.

In part three of this webinar series on authenticity in a post-COVID world, senior executives from sponsor Avery Dennison and Certilogo will be joined by Loris Spadaccini, director and U.S. general manager of Italian fashion brand Save The Duck, to talk about leveraging technology to help consumers make ethical fashion choices. The free webinar will run noon to 1 p.m. ET (New York time) on Tuesday, June 29.

The speakers will explore some of the biggest topics that are top-of-mind for global luxury fashion, including sustainability, traceability, transparency, consumer engagement and technology. They will also share emerging solutions that brands can implement to drive meaningful change to their business, consumers and the planet.

Attendees will learn:

- How consumers' attitudes and behaviors have changed since the pandemic, and how to adapt your business goals and priorities to their evolving needs
- How product authentication is the key driver of various use cases: traceability, circularity, brand protection and consumer engagement
- How to gain customer loyalty and trust through product authentication

- How to implement and monitor sustainable practices through digitally connected products and product authentication
- Look at successful examples of brands using digital authentication solutions to drive sustainability, and support marketing and brand protection priorities

Speakers

- Michael Colarossi, vice president of innovation, product line management and sustainability, Avery Dennison
- Rossella Munaf, chief marketing officer, Certilogo
- Loris Spadaccini, director and general manager for the United States, Save The Duck
- Debbie Shakespeare, senior director for sustainability, compliance and core PLM, Avery Dennison RBIS
- Moderator: Mickey Alam Khan, editor in chief, Luxury Daily

The speakers will take questions from the audience as well.
