Chitose Abe, the fashion designer and founder of Sacai, collaborated with the heritage house back in March 2022 – together, Ms. Abe and Cartier studio creatives crafted a modular moment, emblematic of the Trinity ring's minimalist elements. Once limited to a lucky few located in Tokyo, where the fashion label is based, the brand is rolling out the Trinity for Chitose Ave of Sacai collection in a number of additional markets worldwide.

Whole trinity

After testing the waters with a pop-up execution in Tokyo, followed by retail rounds in key cities, Cartier is finally uniting U.S. customers with the fine jewelry assortment.

A partnership grounded in a reimagining of the jeweler's classic design, Trinity for Chitose Ave of Sacai collection Ms. Abe's artistic vision. Six limited-edition bracelets, rings, ear cuffs and necklaces make up the capsule collection, all playing upon Trinity's three-banded signature.

With prices starting at $3,900, a temporary Tokyo pop-up in Omotesand, which ran from July 7 to July 25 last year, initially introduced the capsule.

Additional locations were added in the event's aftermath – the collection remains available for purchase at retail locations throughout Japan, and at the Maison's Cheongdam store in South Korea. Cartier's New Bond Street and Selfridges locations in the United Kingdom are also stocked, in addition to its new flagship (see story) at 13 Paix and St Honor in France.

Now, on March 1, U.S. luxury buyers will also gain access.

Inspired by Cartier's heritage, bands feature contrasting metal materializations across the board, ranging from silvery cool tones to warming gold hues.

The Trinity ring (see story) was originally conceptualized by Louis Cartier himself back in 1924.
