Italian fashion brand Prada is hosting an exhibition to highlight the harmony between Tokyo's natural features and architectural feats.

Held this month from May 12-13, 2023, the multiannual Prada Mode experience curated by award-winning Japanese architect Kazuyo Sejima has just departed Japan's capital city. Tailored by venue and geographical location, the brand advanced dialogue regarding biophilic design amid one of the world's largest cities during this most recent iteration.

Transformed from Prince Asaka's residence into an art deco museum in 1983, the Teien Art Museum underwent another transformation, albeit temporary, for Prada Mode. Promising a brand-new way to experience art, Prada and Ms. Sejima's collaboration manifested itself in Tokyo's arts and cultural center.

On-site, Prada's two-day event featured dining, fine art within the museum, music by tech house DJ Craig Richards, an architecture workshop, a tea ceremony and conversations under the large wooden pavilion with Ms. Sejima and other guests.

Damien Hirst, the two-day exhibition honed in on multiculturalism in the United Arab Emirates.

Engaging audiences local and global in scope traditionally serves as the goal of each Prada Mode event, an element that the brand's Tokyo activation sought to uphold.

"This place feels like an oasis in Tokyo," said Ms. Sejima, in a statement.

"This is a new type of connection and conversation in which architecture, garden, art and music become one," she said. "This event represents the opportunity for the museum to become a new public space."
