Italian fashion label Tod's is naming the leader that will usher in its next era of design.

Effective immediately, Italian designer Matteo Tamburini will step into the role of creative director following former appointee Walter Chiapponi's departure in September 2023. Mr. Tamburini is taking control of the maison's menswear and womenswear segments and will present his first designs for the brand during Milan Fashion Week in February 2024.

"Matteo Tamburini is a talented creative," said Diego Della Valle, president and CEO of the Tod's Group, in a statement.

"His modern vision of high quality and Italian lifestyle will definitely bring an added value to our brand," Mr. Valle said. "Tamburini will develop a creative team of highly skilled people with an in-depth understanding of the luxury world."

Start of something new

The 40-year-old Mr. Tamburini comes to Tod's after working at Italian fashion house Bottega Veneta as a designer since 2017.

The creative director has worked for a variety of maisons, including French couture label Schiaparelli and LVMH-owned Italian fashion house Emilio Pucci over the course of the past decade.

"I am honored and excited to join the Tod's family and become part of a brand that is so closely tied to my origins and memories," Mr. Tamburini said.

"I identify myself with the brand's values and the continuous pursuit of high quality and style it has undertaken until now, and I look forward to contributing with my expertise."

The fashion world has seen a variety of shake-ups this week, with one of the largest being Givenchy creative director Matthew Williams announcing his departure (see story).
