French jewelry maison Cartier is presenting its work in a celebrated venue.

Beginning this month, the label is showcasing its high jewelry creations inside the Sydney Opera House. Bringing together local design and nature, the display includes bespoke artworks and pieces inspired by the Australian Outback.

Marvelous sights
The branded space takes cues from the host country's wild scenery, such as the Kimberley Gorges on the western side of the continent.

Cartier's jewelry styles are on display within, each piece said to be infused with Australian culture and aspects of the venue itself. Cultural dialogues exist within the items, representing landscapes and elements from the region like Sydney's famous sandstone.

Cartier is a proud partner of the Sydney Opera House

To further this connection to nature, the brand has enlisted local artists Jacqui Fink and Tracey Deep to create works forged with natural materials. Their creations are part of the exhibition space.

Celebrating the partnership, Cartier recently hosted a gala at the Opera House.

Guests were welcomed by a large group of the maison's bellboys and a red carpet leading to the concert hall, where the attendees dined on the stage. A variety of talents performed for the visitors, including pianist Van Anh Nguyen, soprano Cathy Di-Zhang and the Sydney Dance Company.

The recognizable site in Australia is no stranger to luxury interest.

Last year, Dubai, U.A.E.-based airline Emirates renewed its standing partnership with the Sydney Symphony Orchestra, which performs at the Opera House. Through 2025, the collaborators of 21 years will perform around the globe as part of Emirates's longest-running non-athletic sponsorship (see story).
